THE NEED FOR AND THE IMPACT OF CUSOS

By Guy A. Messick, NACUSO General Counsel
& Jack Antonini, NACUSO President & CEO

There are numerous examples of companies that did not adjust to the changes in their industries that are no longer with us. Kodak, Borders Books, and Blockbuster come to mind.

One disruptor has been so effective that its name is now used as a verb in describing the effect, getting “Uber-ed” referring to losing your market to a disruptor with little capital investment.

In hindsight, the disruption to these business models was obvious, yet companies did not act in time. It’s human nature to be in denial when dramatic change is required, but change is often required to survive. Netflix changed from a DVD delivery model to an online streaming model and it’s flourished.

Credit unions are at such an inflection point today. In the 1930s credit unions were the disrupters. In those days, people had very limited choices to obtain financial services. You had to be within a short travel distance from a financial institution, and they had to be willing and able to do business with you. Credit unions used a collaborative model to revolutionize providing reasonably priced services to common folks. They were service oriented.

Today there are hundreds of financial institutions and other specialized financial service providers that are just a click away. Many competitors are convenient and provide superior customer service at low costs. The internet-only competitors don’t have the costs of brick and mortar and extensive regulations.

Using big data, the competitors often know more about the members than a credit union knows. More and more members demand the fintech connections and delivery systems from their providers. They want a mortgage approval within 10 minutes and a car loan in a minute.

Welcome to the digital age where new disrupters offer convenience as simple as a touching the screen on your mobile phone, and if you can’t compete with these well-financed businesses, your membership base will likely wither away over time.

Collaborate Or Lose To The Competition

If you don’t have the internal resources to compete in today’s world of instant gratification through the internet, and you want to survive as an independent credit union, there’s only one effective choice: collaboration.

Fortunately, it’s in the DNA of credit unions to collaborate. Through the CUSO structure credit unions have fostered effective collaborations that create new revenue sources from alternative financial products, dramatically reduced costs, increased the expertise available to credit unions and inspired innovative solutions to the problems facing credit unions.

The inability to create significant spreads in net interest margins in today’s world is of great concern. CUSOs generate much-needed net income for credit unions, helping provide capital to support growth in service to members.

Many credit union leaders know this but are reluctant to change their business model, or are delaying change simply because they don’t know what to do. That is a serious error and will likely lead to pressures to merge that may be hard to resist. The time to change is when a credit union is financially healthy and has options.

THE NEED FOR AND THE IMPACT OF CUSOS

In this directory, there are CUSOs providing financial services (investments and insurance) that generate more than $1 million per year in revenue. Note that this is without any credit risk (as required for interest income) and provides members with valuable services that enhance the total member relationship.

There are also CUSOs that provide high levels of expertise in business, mortgage, and student lending that have enabled the credit union industry to make millions upon millions of dollars of performing loans with reasonable underwriting and servicing costs.

There also are CUSOs that provide a wide variety of operational services (e.g., IT support, IT core services, collections, compliance, internal auditing, call centers, etc.). When the CUSOs are well run, the credit unions enjoy the services at a lower cost with higher expertise than they could obtain on their own.

Joining a CUSO is not the total solution. The credit union must make changes to leverage the revised business model. For many types of operational services, credit unions must agree on common forms, procedures, and policies to realize the benefits of scale.

Credit unions must also adjust internal staff to match their talents to the requirements of the collaboration. You must do more with less people if you expect to reap significant savings.

How To Begin

How do you begin to explore the benefits of collaboration? First, decide what's open to collaboration. At the very least, it's every service that does not interact with the members. But also consider the member-facing services, too. Some of them can be good candidates for collaboration. Then network. Find out who's doing what. Make a list of your collaborative priorities, and your challenges and strengths. Talk to credit unions that are collaborating.

Talk to the people who know this world, such as the folks at Callahan and NACUSO. Come to the NACUSO Annual Network Conference and meet with those who have successfully collaborated and have the scars to tell you how to avoid them.

We have two final thoughts to help guide you. The first is that collaboration is hard work, and needs constant adjustments to fulfill the goals of the credit union owners, but it is worth the effort when done well. Second, work with people you trust and align with temperamentally and philosophically.

The credit union CEOs who are successfully collaborating have connected on a personal level. Then they did a good job aligning the staff and board to the revised business model.

Credit unions jointly face significant challenges. Those who change in time will survive. There are several good collaborative CUSOs that help provide timely solutions.

The choice is yours. Will your credit union be Netflix or Blockbuster?

Guy A Messick is NACUSO General Counsel and Jack Antonini is NACUSO President and CEO.
